WANAMAKER TALKS.

He Explains His Relations to the Keystone Bank.

HIS BUSINESS WAS SQUARE

He Was a Profitable Customer, But Not as Officer. He Held Stock Only as Collateral. The Statement in Detail.

PHILADELPHIA, June 8.—Postmaster General Wanamaker appeared before the [illegible] of the City Press Club [illegible] Mr. Wanamaker being late in arriving at the [illegible] room, the [illegible] proceeded to entertain Rear Admiral Dyer [illegible]. While Mr. Dyer was telling Mr. Wanamaker's story, accompanied by his wife and brother. At the conclusion of Mr. Dyer's story, Mr. Wanamaker stepped forward with a roll of manuscript in his hand and stated that he had prepared and proposed to read a statement in answer to all the allegations that have connected his name with the Keystone bank and give a complete account of his transactions with the institution. Before he began his reading Mr. Wanamaker expressed hope that the committee would ask him any question they desired. The reading and subsequent questioning occupied an hour, during which time Mr. Wanamaker remained standing. When he had finished many persons stepped forward and shook his hand.

Mr. Wanamaker's statement was as follows:

I am glad to have the proper opportunity to give such information as I possess in the matter under investigation. I have noticed the comments of the newspapers and have not the habit of running after gossip, but have ever ready to furnish at call whatever I had of interest to your committee and the public. I am as anxious, and have as much interest as any other, to prevent our city treasury from losing the funds provided by the taxpayers. In order to cover every point that has come to my notice from any source whatever, and that there may be no question as to what I state, I require to write what I have to say and will hand a copy of my remarks to your committee for record if you prefer. I may add that what I here submit is practically what I have freely stated to many persons at various times during the past [illegible].

I have been a depositor only, never was an incorporator or director. I never owned a share of the stock. I held until recently $15 shares as collateral, as hereinafter stated. The firm of John Wanamaker, consisting of three persons, had an account with the Keystone bank, and on this account the checks of the firm were drawn. The firm, by an arrangement with the bank, was made responsible for Mrs. Wanamaker's checks on the bank, which for convenience were kept in a separate account. It was substantially one account under two heads. Mrs. Wanamaker's account could not be overdrawn while the firm account had a balance to its credit. Under these circumstances the account was not overdrawn which show a balance in our favor. It is true that there was an item that the bank charged against our account at its settlement, a month or so before it failed, of about $[illegible] of which no one at our office knows anything about, and which we refuse to recognize until it is explained. If they are right and we are wrong there would be a small balance against us. Though our confidence at the time of the run in December was unshaken as business men, it was of course more or less impaired after the run. We kept up our deposits straight through the panic as appears from the following account taken from our deposit books:

Deposited in Keystone bank in November	$16,[illegible]
Deposited in Keystone bank in December	33,[illegible]
Deposited in Keystone bank in January	30,441 12
Deposited in Keystone bank in February	14,[illegible]
Deposited in Keystone bank in March to 26th, the date of closing	[illegible]
Total	$[illegible]

Knowing, however, as the public did generally, that Mr. Marsh was conferring with stockholders during January to raise assessments on the bank stock, and further knowing it was common rumor that the bank was short, we gradually decreased our balance.

Our line of discount had run off at the bank, and we felt under no special obligation to it. Moreover, we were using our money at the time, reducing our discounts at all the banks. Our course with the Keystone bank was solely dictated by the ordinary prudence of business men. I never knew of any irregularities in the Keystone bank until after the run, when Mr. Lucas intelligence was made known to the directors, as I was informed, and that his estate intended to reimburse the bank which I supposed and was so informed it had ample means to do. At a later period I was told by Mr. Marsh, the president, for the first time, that he feared that some of the stock I held as collateral was not properly issued. I had no knowledge that the bank was going to close its doors. The first I knew of it was when it was made public by telegraph from Philadelphia after the doors were shut. All credits granted to any firm or to myself were made in the regular manner. If the officers were not aware of the fact we may be sure of their ignorance. I have not been active in my mercantile business since 1888, and know but little of the details. From the best information I have the amount of single name paper was $[illegible] to February, 1890. In February, 1890, in addition to this, I had a discount of $[illegible] for five months which was understood to be personal to me individually at the time I received it. Any discounts beyond these not properly chargeable to our firm may arise from the following causes:

On occasion Mr. Marsh called on us for accommodation, saying that he wanted the paper, not for the Keystone bank, as we understood, for country banks, but for the bank's correspondents, and gave us to him. For some time we used to turn over the proceeds to get them by personal. Before the end we learned that it was a Boston bank, and had an immediate account opened from us under some of the clearing house. Before we paid six percent. interest, these were all paid off as they became due.

I borrowed personally from the bank on the one occasion above stated, paper appearing in my personal name, paper received in the course of business which I settled Mr. Lucas' interest to me by reason of his having made his agreement as hereafter stated. This paper was received from our firm in the usual course of business for goods sold and delivered; nor did the bank or its officers ever make any contribution to me of any kind at any time.

I never suggested any person directly or indirectly to the secretary of the treasury or comptroller of the currency for the review of the Keystone bank nor to any one else, and I in any way endeavor to the establishment remotely or otherwise. I did know that my brother had called for Mr. Marsh until I read the newspapers while in the west.

No one communicated to me anything about my brother or any other going bail for Mr. Marsh, nor did I hear of it, or ever consider directly or indirectly the subject of giving or getting bail for Mr. Marsh. [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Marsh [illegible] Mr. John Lucas in a [illegible] away from the [illegible] against his wishes and only until after the accident. In fact, to the best of my recollection, after the knowledge of his investing in various enterprises was established, I had lost all of my great desire to assist in preserving the independence of the Reading railroad property and the I the belief that the [illegible] even had holdings of the stock that were held by parties connectable to the reorganization of it would be profitable and useful. I received him to join me in such a purchase or joint purchase. The agreement between us was to that, and to this effect, that Mr. Lucas was to supply certain sums of money, as I called for them, and deposit the same to my personal account in the Keystone bank. In accordance to that agreement, from the time I direct I took the account the sum of about $[illegible] against [illegible] which I believe was deposited by him as per understanding. Upon several occasions when I notified Mr. Lucas that under our agreement money was needed he brought me stock of the Keystone National bank which he requested me to use in lieu of the money as it was not convenient for him to furnish cash at the time.

As a result, when he died I had in my possession 215 shares of the bank stock. After his death I found that he had not made the deposits to my credit as he agreed, and that my accounts stood withdrawn. When I discovered this I could not find any memorandum and attributed it to some oversight. I immediately made the account good by closing it with commercial paper, received in my business which was all duly paid. Mr. Lucas therefore did not really furnish a penny to me for the purchase of the Reading stock that I held and as I had for his share in the operation was the certificates of stock of the Keystone bank, left with me as collateral.

I held this bank stock subject to an adjustment of the account, and Mr. Marsh and Mr. Lucas called on me in relation to it, but made no settlement. The former was very urgent. No intimation was ever given that the stock was irregularly issued until Mr. Marsh, shortly after the run on the bank in December last, called in person and desired to have the stock returned to the bank. This I declined to do first because I had not obtained it from the bank but from John C. Lucas individually as his private property; secondly because I did not believe the stock in question was over-issued and no proofs were ever offered that such was the case, and thirdly because I was by no means certain that if the stock was over-issued as alleged my title against the bank would in any way be effected. I simply considered the statement as an extreme effort to get possession of the stock which I felt justly entitled to retain.

I maintained this position until the bank was closed, and then recognizing that the stock had no money value, and being further assured that if it was surrendered to the Lucas estate it would help in the rehabilitation of the bank, I saw nothing to be gained by retaining, and therefore surrendered it as requested. I could in this way lose nothing [illegible] which I [illegible] was valueless to me, but might possibly help the reorganization of the bank and save others. Being a collateral holder under the law, I could not be assessed on the stock, hence my supposition that I parted with the stock to avoid assessment is without foundation in fact. I never had any business operations with Mr. Marsh individually or with any firm or corporation with which he was connected except the bank in which he was first cashier and later president.

Last autumn he claimed the bank had strained itself to help customers, and we paid off all our discounts as they became due. He assured me everything was right, precisely as he did the clearing house. After the bank took from the case the "John C. Lucas building" and seashore property he endeavored to get me to buy one or the other or both of those properties. He pressed me to loan my paper for use at the clearing house, to realize upon collateral pledged there, all of which I declined.

About 8 o'clock the night preceding the day the bank closed Mr. Marsh called on me in Washington to say that he had been to the comptroller and informed him of his doubt about the stock and asked me whether I could in any way help the bank. I said no, and the interview closed in three minutes. I had no communication with a living being between that time and the closing of the bank. If at any time it is supposed that I am possessed of any facts, or can give any information relative to the issues now before you, I am readily be called and will promptly respond.

In brief I was a depositor but not an officer of the bank.

I did not know the bank would fail, nor did I delay or touch in any way the adjustment of a receiver.

I am absolutely ignorant of any transaction with Mr. Bardsley within or without the bank.

Instead of the bank losing a penny, I have only been its profitable customer.

The Hayitian Revolt.

NEW YORK, June 8.—Copies of the proclamation and address of President Hyppolite of Hayti regarding the recent revolution on that unhappy island were received here today. In the first of these issued on the first of May, Hyppolite says: "The enemies of order have dared to raise their hands today. At Petit Goave some brigands led by the infamous Sully Guerrier invaded a part of the town and have liberated the prisoners. These being organized under the direction of the General Governor have marched on the general and the other military positions, but the forces of the government, although surprised, have repulsed them vigorously and are now masters of the situation.

In the other proclamation issued May 31, he says he has captured Sully Guerrier at Mornefeal in company of one of his principal accomplices, an officer named Francois Grats and others said Charles and Francois Grats, the most culpable of all, have paid by their heads the penalty for their criminal enterprise. The others have been confined in the prison of this city to be delivered to their natural judges.

Immediately after the uprising congress was called together and Hyppolite made an address to the chamber of senators and deputies, in lieu of the customary message.

The President Did Not Interfere.

WASHINGTON, June 8.—Referring to the published statement that during the time he was a United States senator President Harrison exercised his influence to have the pension allowed which was the other day granted to Mrs. Elizabeth L. Sharr Harrison, his brother's widow, Pension Commissioner Raum said today: "An examination of the papers in the case, and inquiry among those who have had charge of it for years, fail to disclose any interference whatever by General, Senator or President Harrison, or by any one representing him. The case was never disclosed. The truth is, Mr. Harrison never made any request, at any time, in form, affecting the pension which has been granted his brother's widow, and knew nothing about the status of the case at the time the pension was allowed. It went through on its merits alone."

London Omnibus Strike.

LONDON, June 7.—Hardly a single omnibus of the 875 vehicles belonging to the London General Omnibus company is running today, and it is estimated that about 9000 men and 1000 horses are thrown into a state of idleness through the strike, which commenced yesterday. The amount of inconvenience which the working men and business men of this city will thus put to can be readily imagined, when it is understood that tens of thousands of people depend upon the omnibuses to convey them to their work. All the yards of the General Omnibus company are strongly "picketed" by the men on strike, and the usually swarmingly busy main streets of the metropolis present a deserted and forlorn appearance, owing to the absence of the "buses," which are generally weighted down with passengers.

Lying in State.

OTTAWA, Ont., June 8.—In the great dining hall at Earnscliffe lie the remains of its late master. The casket stands on a pedestal in the center of the room, and all the surroundings are most imposing. The hangings of violet and white and their arrangement look quite imposing. When all was done, the metallic casket with its burden was carried down stairs from the room in which the dead man passed away. There the remains will lie until morning, to be viewed by the members of the household and the followers of the late premier, including the members of the cabinet who called at Earnscliffe today.

A Go As-You-Please Race.

DENVER, June 8.—The six-days go as you please pedestrian contest began here this morning at 12:05 at Coliseum hall, on a track sixteen laps to the miles. The starters were: Gus Guerrero of San Francisco, his brother Pat, Tom Cox of Philadelphia, Frank Hart (colored) Boston, Moore, Brooklyn, Cartwright champion of England, Peter Hengleman of New York, George Connor of New York, and Dena of Santa Barbara, California. The score at 12 o'clock noon was as follows:

Cartwright, 72 miles 2 laps; Connor, 71 miles 6 laps; Hengleman, 63 miles 8 laps; Pat Guerrero, 70 miles 8 laps; Moore, 63 miles 1 lap; Cox 65 miles 1 lap; Gus Guerrero, 61 miles 1 lap; Dena, 54 miles 9 laps.

The Behring Sea Bill.

LONDON, June 8.—In the house of lords today, Lord Salisbury in moving a second reading of the bill relating to Behring sea, made sympathetic reference to the death of Sir John McDonald. He said the bill was intended by England to be fair to act on the subject of arbitration and provided for giving compensation where there should be any real loss through England's action. The government did not admit liability for the whole compensation. He believed Russia to be favorable to arbitration. The bill was read a second and third time and passed.

Gibson's Indictment Quashed.

CHICAGO, June 8. Judge Blodgett this morning quashed the indictment against George J. Gibson, secretary of the whisky trust, charged with conspiracy to destroy the Shufeldt distillery. Sir Edward Clarke Talks to the Prince of Wales.

THE FAMOUS TRIAL PROCEEDS

The Argument for the Plaintiff Proceeds. If William Cumming is Expelled from the Army the Prince Cannot Remain.

LONDON, June 8.—When the Tranby Croft court opened this morning the attack of Sir Edward Clarke upon the Prince of Wales, coupled as it was with the Sir Edward's claim the Prince of Wales is responsible, [illegible] On the other hand there is a strong and growing feeling that Gordon Cumming is the victim of a conspiracy which, if not another motive besides the preservation of honor at cards, said that the Wilsons have rather sought than avoided the notoriety attendant upon the trial. The evidence of their previous antecedents as compared with the family record of Gordon Cumming has caused a feeling against them in the aristocratic society in which they have been attempting to hold their own, and the general opinion is that whatever the outcome of the trial, the Wilsons will never again shine in high society. The Prince of Wales is evidently determined to stand by his friend, and he has induced young Wilson to be elected to the Marlborough, which is known as the Prince's private club. This however does not mean an open sesame for the young man to club society in London, for the prince has found to his cost that London clubs will not tolerate his dictation, and that is one reason he started the Marlborough where he could reign supreme, in the company of the cads whom he sometimes charges [illegible]

The outcome of the trial is a subject of wide speculation. The jurors are mostly London tradesmen. A verdict satisfactory to the prince would be to the personal interest of any one of them, for there is nothing a London tradesman desires so much as to put the royal or princely arms on his bags and his boxes. Cumming therefore has powerful influence against him, aside from the evidence. On the other hand the natural English sympathy for the underdog in the fight is with him and the jurymen are not as subservient as some years ago.

The Baccarat Trial.

LONDON, June 8.—The sixth day of the trial of the already famous suit brought by Sir William Gordon Cumming against Mr. and Mrs. Lycett Green and Mr. Berkeley Leavitt for damages on account of alleged slanderous statements by them in regard to baccarat playing at Tranby Croft near Doncaster in September last, was begun this morning.

Previous to and after the opening of the court at 10:30 a. m., the same scenes which were witnessed on each day of the trial last week were repeated, with the exception of the fact that much of the noise and bustle on the part of the Strand was wanting to day, owing to the omnibus strike. On the other hand, there was an increase in the number of "four-wheelers," "hansoms" and other such vehicles arriving and departing at and about the new law courts, and all ordinary fashionables of last week's audiences managed to appear, fully equipped with luncheon baskets and flasks, in their now familiar places, from which they watched the developments of the baccarat scandal. The general opinion expressed when the court opened was that Sir Charles Russell and Sir Edward Clarke might be able to finish their addresses, respectively for the defendants and for the plaintiff, today and that the lord chief justice would make his charge to the jury to-morrow morning. This, however, is only a matter of conjecture.

Sir Charles Russell, upon the opening of the court, resumed his address for the defense, interrupted on Friday last by the adjournment of the court of queen's bench until to-day.

Sir Edward Clarke, for the plaintiff, followed Dr. Charles Russell. Sir Edward made a sensation by saying that it would be impossible for the authorities to strike the name of Sir William Gordon Cumming from the army list and leave the Prince of Wales' name thereon. When Sir Charles Russell sat down after having made a most able speech for the defense, there was a murmur of surprise, he having closed his address rather unexpectedly.

Hardly had Sir Charles taken his seat and while defendants' counsel was still receiving the congratulations of his friends, the solicitor general, Sir Edward Clarke, leading counsel for the plaintiff, took the floor and in a few sentences tersely invited the attention of the jury, his whole manner indicating that a sensation was coming. Sir Edward Clarke commenced by saying that it had been common talk that the Prince of Wales' continual presence in court during the trial of this suit had been for the purpose of restraining the tongues of the lawyers engaged in the case from commenting upon the Prince of Wales' connection with it." His remark caused a sensation, but it was nothing to what followed further utterances of the counsel for the plaintiff.

Continuing Sir Edward Clarke intimated the Prince of Wales' presence in the court would not prevent him from making any comment necessary, saying that he, counsel, had a painful duty to perform, and that he intended to perform it honestly and fairly.

His opponents, he continued, had always been careful to allude to him, counsel for the plaintiff, as the "solicitor-general," and he asked: "While I am proud of the title, I must remind the jury that I appear in this case simply as an English barrister, and I am obliged to disregard friendships and even my own interests and comment on the conduct and evidence of one of the highest in the land." Sir Edward Clarke, as he uttered these last words, turned squarely around until he faced the Prince of Wales, upon whom every eye in court was then fixed, and who nervously crossed his legs while the audience was utterly silent at what was considered to be the audacity of the solicitor-general.

In several directions the whispered comment, "Why he is going to attack the Prince of Wales," was distinctly heard and caused all attention to be riveted upon the plaintiff's counsel.

Continuing, the solicitor-general remarked that Sir Charles Russell, for the defendants, had said that "even if the jury found for the plaintiff and disregarded the document at the latter had signed at Tranby Croft, the military authorities would take the matter up and Sir William Gordon Cumming's name would be stricken from the army list."

"I wish to say in unmistakable terms," exclaimed Sir Edward Clarke, raising his voice until it echoed entirely through the court, "that it would be impossible for the authorities to do any such thing, and to leave on that list the names of Field Marshal the Prince of Wales and General Owen Williams."

This bold statement seemed to completely take away the breath of the audience, and caused by far the greatest sensation of the entire trial. A hushed murmur of astonishment, not unmixed with dismay and some irritation for several seconds, swept through the court room like breakers on a rocky coast.

One must thoroughly understand the almost religious worship of royalty which prevails throughout Great Britain, to clearly understand the full meaning, the crushing significance of the solicitor-general's words, and distinctly write his statement. It was as if a thunderclap had suddenly shaken the building, and as if a flash of lightning had [illegible] the Prince of Wales in colors unexpected. The Baccarat Trial.

LONDON, June 8.—The sixth day of the trial of the already famous suit brought by Sir William Gordon Cumming against Mr. and Mrs. Lycett Green and Mr. Berkeley Leavitt for damages on account of alleged slanderous statements by them in regard to baccarat playing at Tranby Croft near Doncaster in September last, was begun this morning.

Previous to and after the opening of the court at 10:30 a. m., the same scenes which were witnessed on each day of the trial last week were repeated, with the exception of the fact that much of the noise and bustle on the part of the Strand was wanting to day, owing to the omnibus strike. On the other hand, there was an increase in the number of "four-wheelers," "hansoms" and other such vehicles arriving and departing at and about the new law courts, and all ordinary fashionables of last week's audiences managed to appear, fully equipped with luncheon baskets and flasks, in their now familiar places, from which they watched the developments of the baccarat scandal. The general opinion expressed when the court opened was that Sir Charles Russell and Sir Edward Clarke might be able to finish their addresses, respectively for the defendants and for the plaintiff, today and that the lord chief justice would make his charge to the jury to-morrow morning. This, however, is only a matter of conjecture.

Sir Charles Russell, upon the opening of the court, resumed his address for the defense, interrupted on Friday last by the adjournment of the court of queen's bench until to-day.

Sir Edward Clarke, for the plaintiff, followed Dr. Charles Russell. Sir Edward made a sensation by saying that it would be impossible for the authorities to strike the name of Sir William Gordon Cumming from the army list and leave the Prince of Wales' name thereon. When Sir Charles Russell sat down after having made a most able speech for the defense, there was a murmur of surprise, he having closed his address rather unexpectedly.

Hardly had Sir Charles taken his seat and while defendants' counsel was still receiving the congratulations of his friends, the solicitor general, Sir Edward Clarke, leading counsel for the plaintiff, took the floor and in a few sentences tersely invited the attention of the jury, his whole manner indicating that a sensation was coming. Sir Edward Clarke commenced by saying that it had been common talk that the Prince of Wales' continual presence in court during the trial of this suit had been for the purpose of restraining the tongues of the lawyers engaged in the case from commenting upon the Prince of Wales' connection with it." His remark caused a sensation, but it was nothing to what followed further utterances of the counsel for the plaintiff.

Continuing Sir Edward Clarke intimated the Prince of Wales' presence in the court would not prevent him from making any comment necessary, saying that he, counsel, had a painful duty to perform, and that he intended to perform it honestly and fairly.

His opponents, he continued, had always been careful to allude to him, counsel for the plaintiff, as the "solicitor-general," and he asked: "While I am proud of the title, I must remind the jury that I appear in this case simply as an English barrister, and I am obliged to disregard friendships and even my own interests and comment on the conduct and evidence of one of the highest in the land." Sir Edward Clarke, as he uttered these last words, turned squarely around until he faced the Prince of Wales, upon whom every eye in court was then fixed, and who nervously crossed his legs while the audience was utterly silent at what was considered to be the audacity of the solicitor-general.

In several directions the whispered comment, "Why he is going to attack the Prince of Wales," was distinctly heard and caused all attention to be riveted upon the plaintiff's counsel.

Continuing, the solicitor-general remarked that Sir Charles Russell, for the defendants, had said that "even if the jury found for the plaintiff and disregarded the document at the latter had signed at Tranby Croft, the military authorities would take the matter up and Sir William Gordon Cumming's name would be stricken from the army list."

"I wish to say in unmistakable terms," exclaimed Sir Edward Clarke, raising his voice until it echoed entirely through the court, "that it would be impossible for the authorities to do any such thing, and to leave on that list the names of Field Marshal the Prince of Wales and General Owen Williams."

This bold statement seemed to completely take away the breath of the audience, and caused by far the greatest sensation of the entire trial. A hushed murmur of astonishment, not unmixed with dismay and some irritation for several seconds, swept through the court room like breakers on a rocky coast.

One must thoroughly understand the almost religious worship of royalty which prevails throughout Great Britain, to clearly understand the full meaning, the crushing significance of the solicitor-general's words, and distinctly write his statement. It was as if a thunderclap had suddenly shaken the building, and as if a flash of lightning [illegible] the Prince of Wales [illegible] the [illegible] general's intention [illegible] that he [illegible] to be [illegible] and [illegible] to appear totally unconcerned.

After the sensation which followed Sir Edward Clarke apparently busied himself with the other affairs in hand, directed his attention to the jury [illegible] drawn up at Tranby Croft, which accused Sir William Gordon Cumming of cheating at cards, [illegible] the Prince of Wales [illegible] Sir William [illegible] the Prince of Wales [illegible] Sir Edward Clarke [illegible] strong and growing feeling [illegible] Cumming is the victim of a conspiracy which [illegible] another motive besides the preservation of honor at cards said that the Wilsons have rather sought than avoided the notoriety attendant upon the trial. The evidence of their previous antecedents as compared with the family record of Gordon Cumming has caused a feeling against them in the aristocratic society in which they have been attempting to hold their own, and the general opinion is that whatever the outcome of the trial, the Wilsons will never again shine in high society. The Prince of Wales is evidently determined to stand by his friend, and he has induced young Wilson to be elected to the Marlborough, which is known as the Prince's private club. This however does not mean an open sesame for the young man to club society in London, for the prince has found to his cost that London clubs will not tolerate his dictation, and that is one reason he started the Marlborough where he could reign supreme, in the company of the cads whom he sometimes charges [illegible]

The outcome of the trial is a subject of wide speculation. The jurors are mostly London tradesmen. A verdict satisfactory to the prince would be to the personal interest of any one of them, for there is nothing a London tradesman desires so much as to put the royal or princely arms on his bags and his boxes. Cumming therefore has powerful influence against him, aside from the evidence. On the other hand the natural English sympathy for the underdog in the fight is with him and the jurymen are not as subservient as some years ago.

The world loves a brave man, and there will be general applause for the English lawyer who dared to stand in the presence of the Prince of Wales and plead the cause of his client as he would against anyone else. In this time of the world and in England there will be neither chains nor banishment for the bold counsellor, but it was for all that a brave thing to do. As for the prince, the greatest harm will not be in proving him a card player, a heavy better or a heavy drinker. It will come from the fact that a lawyer has dared in open court to speak directly to the prince, to tell of his foibles and declare that secrecy was necessary to protect his reputation, and to insinuate that this member of the royal family was to be bound by the same standards of right and honor as a plain man. And if royal families are not to be judged by a code and standard of their own, and if such men as the now famous juror who dared question the prince and such lawyers as Sir Edward Clarke are to sit in judgment upon them the time is close at hand when the people will decide that the game of royalty is not worth the candle.

There have been many gross and glaring inconsistencies in the Indian policy of the United States. Some of these are widely known; others are in the memory of a few people only, or are entirely forgotten. Of the cases which have become celebrated most are those which show faithlessness or tyranny on the part of the United States, such as breaches of treaties broken, of reservations invaded, of tribes pushed by famine and unreasonable requirements until outbreak became the only possible way of working a change which it did not seem by any possible means could be worse than the condition of affairs already existing. But there are cases where if the United States has been unjust it has been in favor of the Indian; cases in which it has seemed that the government, recognizing the wrongs and injustice done to the Indians, has striven to make amends by straining the laws to get at the escape of some murderous and blood-thirsty savage. There was an instance of this in the failure to fully punish the authors of the Meeker massacre, another in the treatment of the Chiricahua Apaches, and many more throughout the years of history in the various states. In any consideration of the Indian question these should not be forgotten. They do not excuse the government for mistakes of another kind, for both sides are injustice, but they may be held to balance the Indian account partially, for if he has often received wrong, he has sometimes received better than he deserved. A recent conspicuous example of this class of injustice is found in the acquittal of Plenty-Horse, the Sioux murderer of Lieutenant Casey on the ground that there was a state of war existing between the nation of the Sioux and the nation of the United States, and that consequently the armed combatants of the one had a right to kill the armed combatants of the other. Clearly this idea is an incongruous one, for if the government has the right to keep the Indians on a reservation, and under the restraint of an agent, the duty of the soldiers at this time was that of police rather than of a military force in time of war. It would be almost as reasonable for an armed band of counterfeiters or moonshiners to defend their resistance by saying that they were at war with society. There must have been a ground for the treaty to stand on, but it was an illogical one. We can see that the case of this Indian was not that of an ordinary murderer, nor on the other hand was it that of officer or private in an army recognized as belligerent. There is no logical place in our system for the Indian except as wild beast or citizen. If it is said that he is not fit for a citizen, he should be either trained or killed. To recognize him as an independent hostile is a part of the same policy of alternate sentimentality and cruelty which has caused most of the troubles in the past and which now stands most of all in the way of settling the Indian question.

WESTERN SCIENTIFIC ASSOCIATION.

The following circular has been issued that will fully explain itself. It is signed by the parties whose names are given and a large number of others:

DEAR SIR—Among a number of educators and scholars of the U. S. I am asking for a co-operation in the pursuit of literary culture, philological and scientific investigations, in dialectical and pedagogical studies, has arisen; and after careful consideration and discussion, they have concluded to send out a circular to their fellow scholars, to inquire whether the time has not arrived when the West should have a Philological and Scientific Association as well as the East. Experience teaches us that nothing tends more to raise the standard of education in any section of the country than the constant exchange of thoughts and the reading of philological, scientific and literary papers on the leading questions of the day. Nor is there anything which tends more to promote this than an association where educators and literary men from all parts of the country meet and critically discuss original papers. The East is so distant that most of us can rarely attend its many associations of this nature, where we can find that inspiration and [illegible] which will help so effectually in our intellectual development. If we can succeed in establishing here in the N. W. the aims of which shall be literary, philological and scientific scholarship, practical and scientific discipline, it will be the means of raising the educational standard of our section, it will give impetus to literary culture, to philological and scientific [illegible], and will be just the aid we need in improving and developing this region.

An association suitable to this part of the country at present will need to be organized on the plan of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, though larger in its scope. It should represent the following departments: Literature, philology, physical science, pedagogy, history, philosophy and political science. This will give us a field large enough to make an interesting and profitable association. It is believed that there will be no conflicts between the different departments, but that each will be beneficial to the others. It will tend to broaden the views of all and prevent that narrowing process so likely to follow where there is no interchange of thoughts and opinions.

The right hand of such an organization is a journal, which is the best means to the end proposed. In it sound views on these various subjects could be brought before our reading public. It should contain original articles, reviews of books, discussions of pedagogical questions, and literary articles on topics of general interest. Such a journal would naturally grow out of an organization of this kind in a very few years, and could be well maintained by the west and soon reach the high standard.

The states of Nebraska, the two Dakotas, Wyoming, Colorado, Kansas, Texas, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and the territories of Utah and New Mexico, can well support such an association, if once thoroughly organized. The question now is, shall we organize and place the west in that position in the intellectual and educational world which she is able to take and ought to maintain with honor? The undersigned believe the time for action in the organization of such an association has arrived, and ask you to join them in their efforts to arouse a proper interest in the undertaking.

It is proposed to meet some time next fall and organize, and we desire the personal attendance of as many as possible, and letters from as many as are not able to attend. The question of the time of meeting, whether during the winter holidays, Easter holidays, or summer vacation, will be discussed, and we should like to have your opinion on this point. Suggestions on all points bearing upon the Association are also solicited.

THE BRIBERY CASES.

The result of the accusations of bribery brought against Senator Stevenson and Mr. Otto Mears is such as to remind one of the infantile epitaph:

"Since I am so quickly done for,
I wonder what I was born for."

The thing most creditable to those responsible for the accusations is that in the general public feeling that prevailed and in the desire of the minority of the Eighth general did semibly to find an excuse for their inexcusable actions, the grand jury felt that like the Irishman at Donnybrook, they must strike at the first head that was outlined against the tent canvas. Another theory is that the real bribe givers and bribe-takers used the "stop thief" cry to cover their own ill-doings. This theory gains plausibility from the fact that no serious effort was made to bring to justice those who confessed themselves accessory to crime, since they said they had been approached, but refused to say by whom. However, District-attorney Stevens is entitled to due credit for not wasting more time and money in these cases, and also for his frank statement in declaring the lack of evidence against the accused.

Commercial Travelers' Home.

COLORADO SPRINGS, June 8, 1891.

To the Editor of the GAZETTE:

I enclose article taken from the Chicago Daily Tribune of June 2d, by which you will see that the Travelers' Protective Association contemplates the erection of a "home" or "sanitarium" for disabled "knights of the grip."

Colorado Springs should be "the home" of all such institutions, and when our people become alive to the importance of supporting a board of trade or some such organization whose duty it will be to look after such things, we will have the first chance with associations contemplating the erection of such "homes," but not before.

Are there not enough men of public spirit here to get together and revive the board of trade under another name—say the "chamber of commerce?"

I pause for a reply, and I need not say that I stand ready to aid in the good work. Yours truly,

M. L. DECOURSEY.

The following is the article referred to:

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., June 2.—The National convention of the Travelers' Protective association met at Little Rock today. The meeting was called to order by President McGrew of St. Louis, who introduced Governor Eagle. The governor welcomed the knights of the grip to Arkansas, and then Mayor Fletcher of Little Rock turned the keys of the city over to the travelers. The convention started in its work under the most favorable auspices. Some discussion arose over the change of the name of the association, with which D. K. Clink of Chicago was not satisfied. Mr. Clink was hopelessly in the minority and gracefully succumbed to the inevitable. Pending the report of the committee the convention took a recess until tomorrow.

There will be an effort made to locate a sanitarium for disabled traveling men, and Texas is here in force to capture the prize. It is likely, however, that no action will be taken at the present meeting, as the association has not sufficient surplus fund on hand to justify so mammoth an undertaking. Hot Springs, Ark., also wants the sanitarium and the claims presented by that city on account of the peculiar medicinal properties of the water are strong arguments to commercial travelers.

WHAT BACCARAT IS.

A Game Like Vingt et Un, but with More Combinations.

New York Commercial Advertiser.

Baccarat, rarely ever played in America, is the favorite fashionable gambling game of England and the Continent. It is gambling pure and simple, may be played by any number of players and with any number of packs of cards. All bet against the dealer, who banks, and deals from a box similar to a cigar box. The face cards each count ten, and the others according to the number of their spots. After the bets have been made the banker deals two cards to each of the players, including himself, but the other players must revive their cards before the banker is served.

The aim of the players is to make the numbers 9, 19, 29, or as nearly those as possible, as 8, 18 and 28. Any player is at liberty either to "stand" with the two cards first dealt or to call for more, at the risk of exceeding 29, when his stake is forfeited to the dealer. If after the first distribution of two cards to each, any player has a "natural"—that is, a sum making 9, or next in value, 19—he declares it, and the banker pays all who hold superior hands to his own, and claims from those holding inferior hands. The players stake their money separately, three being, in fact, as many separate games in progress as there are players, and the spectators may wager their money on any one of them, all of which must be accepted by the banker.

Prior to the banker making a start, he states the amount in the bank, for example, $20. Any one sitting down at the table has the right to call the whole of the bank, leaving the left for the right on which to pick up the cards. If the bank is not called, then the banker proceeds to deal to $20 a side, or as much of it as may be "marked" or called—the former meaning that the money is placed on the table, the latter, that the banker has accepted the bet without the money being staked. The larger aspect, however, in the exception, the really cool betting invariably plastered. Previous to the banker dealing the cards, it is the duty of two croupiers, one on the right and the other on the left, to count up the stakes deposited on either side and then make up the bank. Thus the banker knows to the smallest coin the exact amount of his bankroll. Had the game been properly played at Tranby Croft no one would have stood an earthly chance of cheating.

PRESS COMMENT.

Denver News, June 5.

Even death decorated his triumphs for the whole people admirers and adversaries, stood smitten with grief at his approaching end. The Canadian Pacific railroad will be his enduring monument. From his death we must date a new period of doubt and danger, during which his successors must be dependent upon the intrinsic worth of the ideas he bequeathed, without the magic of his great personality.

A Peculiar Experiment.

Denver Sun.

The pastors of the Protestant churches of Colorado Springs have arranged a peculiar programme of Sunday evening exercises for the next two months. One of them is to begin with a sermon entitled: "Why I Am a Christian." Then the others are to logically follow as the Christ Sabbaths will tell the why they are the peculiar kind of Christians they are. Thus there will be a series of sermons on these subjects: "Why I Am an Episcopal," "Why I Am a Unitarian," "Why I Am a Methodist," "Why I Am a Congregationalist," and "Why I Am a Baptist."

These sermons will certainly be highly interesting and exceedingly edifying. But is not the experiment of their successive delivery a little hazardous? The persons for being so many different varieties of the same thing must conflict. As the logicians would put it, the reasons for the existence of so many denominational species of the one Christian religion cannot be all in accord and perfect harmony. Hence as the explanatory or defining series of sermons continues the denominational differences must appear. Their expression can scarcely be avoided. And may there not be some resultant irritation?

There is nothing so strong in man as the spirit of contention. That is the last thing which divine grace overcomes, either in minister or layman. Nothing is straining to friendship as the discussion of questions on which there are radical differences of opinion. It often becomes dangerous, and is sometimes disruptive and fatal. And the greater extent to which these differences are the result of differing traditions, associations, feelings and temperaments, the greater the danger of explosive and ruinous results. People may make all sacrifices for their friends and yet be severely and even cruelly intolerant of their peculiar views.

As the peculiar series of sermons at Colorado Springs continues, apostolic succession, ritualism, universal salvation, Trinitarianism, falling from grace, the form of church government, final perseverance, free-will, election, open and close communion and eternal punishment must almost inevitably be brought out and discussed. How can the various pastors tell why they are specifically and exactly what they are and avoid these matters? And can these things be trained around and mixed up together even in the most moderate degree and not come into collision and perhaps get into commotion? They will need to be handled with wonderful skill and delicacy to avoid such result. If the Colorado Springs pastors, indeed, go through with their proposed series of sermons without any resultant irritation or straining of relations, they may ever afterwards be justly considered models of considerateness and charitableness.

BASE BALL.

Western Association.

DENVER-KANSAS CITY.

DENVER, June 8.—The home team pulled itself together today and by good team work, coupled with hard hitting, won the game from Kansas City. Sowders was knocked out of the box in the fourth, and Johnson, who relieved him, was batted all over the field. The visitors could do nothing with Kennedy. Score:

Denver	0	0	2	3	1	1	5	2	0	14

Earned runs—Denver 1, Kansas City 1.
Two-base hits—Metcalfe, McClellan.
Bases stolen—McGuire, Manning and Hoover.
Double plays—Kennedy, McClellan and O'Brien.
Bases on balls—Off Kennedy, 3; off Sowders, 2; off Johnson, 2.
Struck out—By Kennedy, 6; by Sowders, 2; by Johnson, 1.

Umpire—Gaffney.

MILWAUKEE-MINNEAPOLIS.

MILWAUKEE, June 8.—The Millers and the Huskers played another very pretty game today. Meakin made his first appearance with the home team and did good work in the box and at the bat. The Huskers did most of the hitting and the Millers got the runs. Score: Sioux City, 4; Minneapolis, 5.

LINCOLN—OMAHA.

LINCOLN, June 9.—After three days of enforced idleness on account of rain Lincoln and Omaha came together this afternoon, the home team winning with ease. They batted Edelson hard and fielded perfectly. O'Day was wild at the start but steadied down and pitched winning ball. Score: Lincoln, 10; Omaha, 2.

ST. PAUL-MILWAUKEE.

ST. PAUL, June 8.—St. Paul received her first shut out this season at the hands of the Milwaukees today with a game replete with brilliant fielding. It was a pitcher's battle from start to finish. Vogel, the new pitcher for the locals, while a little wild, held the visitors down to three hits. St. Paul, 1; Milwaukee, 3.

National League.

BROOKLYN-CLEVELAND.

BROOKLYN, June 8.—The Clevelands held the lead until the ninth inning in the game with Brooklyn today. In that inning Grim lost his grip and the Brooklynites jumped on him and made three runs. Both sides played a loose fielding game. In the third inning there was a collision between Pinckney and McAteer while the latter was running to second base, in which McAteer was injured. After a wait he was able to go on but Seward took his place in the field. Score: Brooklyn, 7; Cleveland, 6.

BOSTON CHICAGO.

BOSTON, June 8. The Bostons could not hit Hutchinson today, kept in one inning. In the eighth when Chicago had a lead of five to nothing, Hutchinson let them come easy and Storey got in a home run. The home club made two more runs in this inning. Anson's men got on to Clarkson in pretty good shape, Wilmot making two home runs. Long's fielding at short was the feature of the game. Attendance, 5,000. Score: Chicago, 5; Boston, 3.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, June 8.—The New Yorks kept up their winning ways today by defeating the Pittsburgs for the time in which they displayed superiority in all departments of the game. Welch and Baldwin were the opposing pitchers, and the former fed all the best of it. Score: New York, 6; Pittsburg 1.

CINCINNATI—PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA, June 8.—The Cincinnatis and Phillies played a fine game up to the seventh inning today. In that inning the visitors got in their work in great shape, knocking their hits nicely for four runs. The home team shifted pitchers but Cincinnati got there just the same. Mullane pitched a good game. Smith's play at short was a feature. Score: Cincinnati, 6; Philadelphia, 8.

American Association.

At Columbus—Athletic 4; Columbus 2.
At Cincinnati—Cincinnati 4, Washington 6.
At Louisville—Louisville 2, Baltimore 1.
At St. Louis—St. Louis-Boston game postponed; wet ground.

Conflicting Reports.

DULUTH, Minn., June 8.—After July 4 the St. Paul club of the Western association will make Duluth its home, the franchise having been bought by J. W. Anderson of this city a few days ago.

ST. PAUL, June 8.—Manager Watkins stated positively this afternoon that nothing has yet been decided in regard to a transfer of the St. Paul franchise. He declares it is his intention to keep it here if he possibly can.

CONCERNING HEBER NEWTON.

Careful Analysis of His Views and Status.

(Special Correspondence.)

NEW YORK, June 5.—The Rev. R. Heber Newton, D. D., rector of All Souls' church, New York city, is at the present moment one of the best talked about clergymen in the United States. The action of his clerical brethren in asking Bishop Henry C. Potter, of the diocese of New York, to appoint a committee of clergymen to examine the orthodoxy of Dr. Newton, has drawn the attention of Episcopalians to him in a manner and to an extent which are amazing, none the less so because the book on which the charges rest was published four years ago.

To his friends and those who agree with him Dr. Newton is a man threatened with persecution from that element inherent in every church—the element which dreads change of any kind before all things. It is natural, under the circumstances, that they should regard the movement with some bitterness, and should denounce those who have taken part in it as wilfully trying to injure a good man from envy or other unworthy motives. To them the freedom of discussion and the right of private judgment are very dear, and what they believe to be an attack on these in the person of one who has done much to bring that which is new in religious thought before his hearers they strongly condemn.

To his opponents and those who disagree with him Dr. Newton is a man who, in his published utterances, has denied dogmas which they believe necessary to the life of the Protestant Episcopal church. They look on him as doubly dangerous in that he is making these alleged attacks from within, and they cry aloud that he whom they believe to be a traitor should be thrown without the wall of the camp. They declare that in these days the church is threatened by many enemies, and that it is the duty of her children to defend her.

The truth of the matter may be found somewhere between these extremes, but in order to understand it it is necessary to examine the man Heber Newton apart from the doctor of divinity. To begin with, he is and always has been far more of a preacher than a parish priest. His intellectual faculties dominate his practical sympathies; he is more at home in the polemical work of his calling than in the details of his parish labor. In all ages and in all denominations there have been these men, and to them the world owes the discoveries, the definitions, the elaborate arguments, the great systems of theology. A refinement of this class of mind has produced the casuists.

REV. R. HEBER NEWTON, D. D.

As a student Dr. Newton has great gifts. He is possessed of a marvelous memory, he has read exhaustively and he has accumulated great stores of learning. But he is a man who lacks mental perspective. If a subject appeals to him it is with a force and in a manner that excludes all other subjects for the time being. He bends all the power of his mind to that one thing, and he follows it out to the logical end unflinchingly. He does not see that other things, were he to reflect on them, might alter the conclusions to which he has arrived. Were he steering a ship he would calculate the direction of the wind and fix his helm; he would forget the currents which might prevent his arrival at his destination. The illustration is not good, but it will serve.

It may not be denied that many of the old beliefs, at one time part and parcel of the churches, are not held to be necessary by many men today. This movement among men has gathered strength during the present century. It was recognized by the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal church when they declared the Apostles' creed and the Nicene creed to contain all dogma necessary. It is making itself felt among the Presbyterians in the demand for a revision of the Westminster Confession. There is a cry abroad among the people for more liberty in belief, it is contended, that conditions may modify that which we must have faith in. This movement, rightly understood, is but the postulate of the evolution in government, in customs, in all else that affects society.

The effect of such a movement on such a man as Dr. Newton might have been foreseen. He has taken hold of it, and has carried it on beyond the point where many men will follow. He has not been restrained by memories of the past; he has been unable to see that the church to which he belongs rests on that, and derives from it her right to her present.

Dr. Newton suffers. He is a deeply religious man, and one who feels acutely being criticised and misunderstood. There is probably in his mind no difficulty whatever in reconciling his strongest utterances with the creeds; he is unable to understand how such difficulty may present itself to others. Like others who have preceded him in this most unhappy of all lots, that of the path finder, the maker of the way, he is a man who has the courage of his convictions, and he has spoken out for what he believes to be the truth. His request that a committee be appointed showed he was ready and eager for the fray. But for all that he is pained to suffer much before the smoke of battle has cleared away; and it may be for the time his opinions will be condemned.

WHY I AM A CHRISTIAN

First of the Series of Sermons at the First Baptist Church

The Rev J P Lee delivered the first of the series of sermons he will give to a large audience in the First Baptist church last Sunday evening

The texts of the sermon were Job 11 and Acts 11 26 the former being adequate to certify the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints and that from the Acts statement And the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch

Mr Lee spoke on the name and doctrine of the Christians It is further that they are entitled to the respect and honor of the world in its religious life

Regarding the Christian faith it has been to restore the Bible scriptures to the proper place of authority in the church as against the assumption of the Roman Pontiff and the traditions of men It would free mankind from the bondage of creeds and priestcraft and would unite the Christian world in one fold

I find no warrant for restoring Christ to the pitiful place of a mere ideal the product of man It is not his conception as by judgments inferential and deductive It has not restored the text into its original form, believing such work to be a necessity It has sought to restore Bible names for Christian churches By restoring these features the primitive hour hand half past the apostolic noon

The few general statements as to the future name the works and faith of the Christian He first of them was to extend for the visible organic unity of all Christians upon the common interpretations of Protestantism The platform of the Christian church is simple as it has one Lord one baptism and one God That church seeks to restore the authority of the scripture over that of church or creed It aims to secure a pure speech among the people of God by substitution of the Bible for human creeds facts for definitions things for words and faith for speculation

Dolson's Examination.

The preliminary examination of Dolson who killed A P Crowe in the Colorado City blacksmith shop was brought up in Justice Walker's court yesterday afternoon Eight witnesses were called, and their testimony went to show that Crowe fell three times the day of his death, once just before entering the shop when he was struck by Dolson he fell on his head and shoulders, being drunk at the time and after leaving the shop and arriving in Manitou he fell in the waiting car in that place and struck his head against the seat This last fall, the defendant's attorney attempted to show, was so liable to have caused the death of Crowe as the blow from Dolson's nippers The preliminary examination was continued until to-day at 10 o'clock, when the testimony of Doctors Marlow and Strickler for the prosecution, and Dr. H. M. Gideon of Manitou for the defendant will be heard.

A MARVELOUS CHANGE.
BOISE CITY Idaho June 8 1891
The president of the Union Pacific system General Manager S H H Clark Supt E. Dick Inwood and other officers of the Union Pacific Railway company visited Boise City yesterday Their inspection was not as thorough as it should have been yet nevertheless it was a suggestive review It is but two years since Mr S H H Clark visited us, yet the changes were a revelation of the new spirit which has gone over the city They were driven to the great hot wells pouring out a million gallons a day of sparkling water and they rode around the hotel grounds There were everywhere great stacks of mammoth pipes made expressly for hot water conduits excavations for reservoirs immense rock for the walls of the great plunge baths, and tons of materials for all the other departments and improvements of the hot water system Our beautiful shady drives were found obstructed by poles for the arc light service and tree rails wires and poles for the electric motor line. They found forty beautiful and costly cottages in course of erection excavations everywhere for cellars and foundations the business streets blocked with piles of brick, stone and lumber. They found a city so busy in trade and building that few knew that the reception committee of the Board of Trade were escorting about the town a party of men who so lately held in their hands the keys to our future prosperity They could not fail to see that the faith and enterprise of the city was largely in a temper of the so long dormant that if the Union Pacific does not speedily take the matter in hand, other companies will build into Boise very speedily The Union Pacific attitude of indifference is only the first but foolish attitude of the bull on the railroad track and can only result in disaster to the bull. The people know this, and every train brings heads of good and enterprising citizens to Boise City determined to take their chances with Idaho's peerless capital.
